DEPARTMENT OF HISTORY

‘Certificate Course in Rural Journalism’

Introduction:

Rural candidates learn the basics of journalism practice for all media forms, including news and feature writing styles, journalistic research, journalism-specific legal and ethical needs, and presentation and publication of journalism. Those candidates who have the ability to speak frequently, ability to write in a concise, style, objective as well as an accurate material is easy to understand, able to evaluate the “newsworthiness” of stories and information is the most appropriate for Certificate Course in Journalism. Whether your background is in journalism and media, organizational communication, advertising or public relations, this course will equip you to apply advanced knowledge and skills in a range of contemporary contexts.

Rural candidates who are interested in people, events, and places, have amazing listening and observational skills, decent general knowledge, a strong ability for conducting independent research and good grammar, spelling, and punctuation also are the best match for it. Candidates, who are able to shoot, edit and tell stories through video, fundamental ability to make interactive story elements by utilizing adobe flash, ability to edit audio as well as produce podcasts, be able to file from the field of breaking news and be able to moderate web discussion also are the best match for this course.

Career Prospects:

A graduate can start his career as a reporter, correspondent/special reporter, feature writer, leader writer proof reader’s editor, columnist critic, photojournalist and cartoonist for any newspaper organization. Since journalism is such a broad field, there are many opportunities to change jobs. News reporters and correspondents with graduate degrees become executives more quickly. Those candidates who are interested in returning to academics can get a faculty position in universities and colleges. Candidates can also shift to marketing and business departments in news organizations.

In the recent years, the market for web journalism has constantly expanded at a very fast rate. Big numbers of people prefer getting their news through the Internet instead of newspapers. This has conducted a broad demand for web journalists, and various publishers, broadcasters, and different news agencies are queuing up to take advantage of the new technologies. But, competition remains stiff for jobs on news magazines, big daily papers, and the major cable, TV, and radio networks.
